What is a gastroscopy?

A gastroscopy is a procedure in which a flexible tube with a camera at the tip is passed through the mouth in to the oesophagus, stomach and first part of the small bowel.

Why is a gastroscopy performed?

A gastroscopy is performed to evaluate symptoms of indigestion, upper abdominal pain, nausea, vomiting, bleeding, or difficulty swallowing. Biopsies (samples of tissue) can be taken to determine sites of infection, to test the functioning of the small bowel and to diagnose abnormal tissue, including conditions such as coeliac disease and cancerous lesions.

How do I prepare for a gastroscopy?

An empty stomach is essential for a safe examination, so you must not eat or drink, for a period of time before your procedure.

During the gastroscopy

Before the procedure a light anaesthetic (sedative) is given. You may be slightly aware of what is going on in the room, but generally you won't remember anything. The back of your throat may be sprayed with local anaesthetic to make it numb, and a small mouth guard is put between your teeth. Once sedated and lying on your left side, the endoscope is passed through your mouth and then in turn through your oesophagus, stomach and duodenum.

The endoscope does not interfere with your breathing. The procedure takes about 15 minutes.

After a gastroscopy

You will be monitored until most of the effects of the sedation have worn off. Your throat might be a little sore, and you might feel bloated because of the air introduced into your stomach during the procedure. You will be provided with light refreshments after your procedure.

Safety and risks

If a biopsy has been taken there may be minor bleeding. Other potential risks include a reaction to the sedative used or very rarely, the stomach lining may be torn.
